Prospect Latin School offers alternative curriculum

Forget coloring and sing-a-longs. Some local pre-schoolers are learning everything from Latin to Spanish, and even playing the piano. It's part of a new academic program that is offered at a new school.

The Prospect Latin School opened up this month, and it's offering what some other preschools are not. It's a $2.2 million Academic Preschool where Latin is incorporated into the curriculum.

The school right now has just 12 students, but the capacity for 190. Students are two to five years old, and all the teachers have either bachelor's or master's degrees in early childhood education.

Educators say the Latin and piano programs help boost preschoolers' math and literacy skills. The school is also one of the first in Kentucky to follow the Reggio Emilia teaching philosophy, which includes plenty of hands-on activities from working with computers to playing with clay. And it's this approach to learning that has some parents quickly signing their children up.

Educators say children are able to absorb and learn so much at an early age because their brains are still developing. They say skills learned now will help the children throughout their school years.

Tuition is about $170 per week for the regular day program.

The Prospect Latin School is having an official grand opening on Saturday, April 15th.
